He Got It.

One of the most touching things we have read in a long time is that story of a robber and a poor lone woman in Ohio. The robber came to her house at night and demanded her money or her life. She hadn't much money or life either, but she preferred giving up the former rather than the latter; so she brought her little store and placed it in his hand. He looked it over carefully, to see that she didn't palm off any 20cent pieces for quarters, and facetiously told her that he could credit her for only 94 cents on the trade dollars, chiding her for taking them at their face value. "Haven't you anything else of value?" inquired the bold, bad burglar, looking about the scantily furnished apartment; "a child's bracelet, ring, anything will be thankfully received." She had nothing more, she replied, with a sigh. A thought struck him. "Your husband was a soldier, was be not?" She acknowledged that he was, and was killed in the war. "Then he must have had a revolver," he continued, searching her countenance. "Ah, you grow confused; you stammer; your manner betrays you. Get that revolver at once and give it to me." In vain the woman implored him to spare that harmless trinket, almost the sole memorial of the husband she had lost. She had pawned many things while in distress, but had always hung on to that. But the robber was unrelenting. Sobbing bitterly, she went to a bureau drawer and removed the precious relic, around which clustered so many tender recollections. "Must you have it?" said she, advancing Corner Chenamus and Hamilton Streets with trembling step toward him. "Yes, I must," said the robber, extending his hand. "Well, then, take it," said she, gently pressing the trigger for the last time. There was a loud report, and the robber tumbled over dead. The community ought to pension that woman. -Cincinnati Saturday Night.
